Grade: VII	Div: _____	Roll No: _____	Date: _____

Section A (Reading)

1. Read the passage given below and answer the questions that follow:

1. Bees are flying insects that feed on nectar and pollen. They are usually yellow and black and covered in fuzzy hair which makes collecting pollen easier. A bee's body is similar to that of other insects – with three major sections: the head, the middle section called the thorax and the last section called the abdomen.
2. The head of a bee has five eyes for seeing and two antennae for touching and smelling. Two sets of wings and three sets of legs can be found on a bee's thorax. Depending on the type of bee, the last set of legs might have little sacs that store the pollen that the bee has collected from flowers.
3. Many types of bees have stingers. The bee stinger is the most feared part of a bee, and for good reason. Filled with poison, the stinger is a bee's protection from danger. The stingers are around 12 millimetres long. There are over 20,000 known bee species in the world. The best known is probably the honeybee.
4. Honeybees live in beehives, which have a distinct order that helps things run smoothly. At the bottom of the totem pole are the workers. Workers are young female bees. Some of their main duties include going out to find food (nectar and pollen), building the hive, and keeping it clean. Only the queen bee can lay eggs and she is followed and fiercely protected by the others in the hive. A larva is selected and specifically fed royal jelly by the worker bees, for it to develop into a mature adult queen bee.
5. Honeybees travel up to eight miles if necessary to find nectar and pollen and bring it back to the hive. Worker bees are actually the only bees that ever do any stinging. It is usually because they are trying to protect their hive from harm. A bee rarely stings when it is away from the hive; it stings only if it senses danger. The lifespan of a worker bee is anywhere from 4 to 9 months.

 1. Aaron shivered at the bottom of the summit as a cool breeze rushed by him. The moon was still in the sky but lowered each minute to make room for the sun in the early hours of the morning. He tilted his head back to view the highest point of the peak—he could hardly imagine himself and his friends at the top. Jordan was one of the best climbers in the group and she had agreed to lead the crew of five up to the top of Cadillac Mountain in Acadia National Park, the highest peak on the eastern Atlantic coast, and one of the first places to see the sunrise in the United States.
 2. "Everyone, let's get moving! We don't want to miss the sunrise!" Jordan called out from the front of the pack. Patty, Aaron, and Patty's two friends picked up their pace and followed Jordan's orders, each walking in silence.
 3. Aaron fell to the back of the group to take in the surroundings—the blanket of deep green trees below, the gray rocks that formed a jagged line across the horizon, and the blue of the sky, brightening with each passing minute. Finally, out of breath, the group reached the top of the peak.
 4. Jordan checked her watch. "It's 5:53, just five minutes before sunrise," she said. Patty took a seat on the rocky ground. "I can't believe we're really here," she whispered. Everyone sat beside her and waited to watch the sun peek above the horizon. When it did, they all let out a gasp.
 5. A bright, illuminated orange ball rose above the horizon, seemingly rising out of the ocean. The group remained silent as the sky changed colours, the orange from the sun blending with the blue hues of the sky, then forming pink streaks, casting purple shadows on the sea of clouds.
